Anglo Indian Times

For over 300 years the British made India their home and in that span, gradually but surely they imported their unique winning ways: their civil administration, their ideas of democracy, their railways, their army and most importantly their food. This import of the British ways resulted in a distinctly unique cultural milieu called the Colonial Raj or the British Raj which cannot be seen anywhere else but in India.

British officers returning home and having developed a taste for the Indian spices, hospitality and culture, took back with them all that they so enjoyed during their stay in India, inadvertently laying the foundation of Anglo Indian cuisine in the UK, that today is so visible in its presence in the form of the numerous Indian restaurants.

Detailed news article from a newspaper, starting with 'Bombay's...'. The text discusses various events, including a meeting of the Executive Council and the Governor's message. It mentions the Governor, Sir John CawGla, and the people of Bombay Province. The article also touches upon the anniversary of India's independence and the Dominion of India. There are several paragraphs of text, some in bold, and some in italics. The text is somewhat blurry and difficult to read in detail, but it appears to be a formal news report.
