唐茶苑 YAUATCHA

The Great Race: the story of the Chinese zodiac

Long ago in ancient China, the Jade Emperor decided to hold a Great Race to decide the animals which would name each of the twelve zodiac years. The race involved crossing a great and mighty river to reach the heavenly altar.

On the morning of the race, Rat awoke early and hatched a mischievous plan to climb onto Ox and hide behind his ear. Ox, unknowing, travelled with the clever Rat aboard his back. Just as he was about to reach the altar, Rat jumped off and reached the finish line first, with Ox coming a close second.

The strong and passionate Tiger came third, followed by the sensitive Rabbit who, by a fortunate stroke of serendipity, had been blown to shore by the gracious and powerful Dragon. Horse arrived at the finish line next, although hidden on his hoof was Snake, whose appearance gave Horse such a fright that Snake took sixth place while Horse came seventh. Not long after, Goat, Monkey and Rooster came to shore on a raft, closely followed by Dog who, although the strongest swimmer, couldn't resist playing in the river.

Just as the Jade Emperor was about to close the Great Race, a squealing was heard. Pig had gotten hungry and stopped for a snack and a short nap. Even though he was late, he had arrived before the end of the race, so he took the final twelfth place.

Facing outrage from the other animals about Rat winning the race using deception, the Jade Emperor merely stated:

"The result cannot be changed, as playing tricks is a form of wisdom."
